Civil Action No. 2:07CV139

JURY TRIAL DEMANDED

DEFENDANTS' REPLY TO PLAINTIFFS' OPPOSITION TO DEFENDANTS' MOTION TO COMPEL AND MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT

I. Introduction

In their Opposition to Defendants' motion to compel compliance with Patent Rule 3-1, Plaintiffs (collectively, "Centocor") pay only passing lip service to the central consideration in Abbott's motion: the text of this Court's Patent Rule 3-1(e), which required Centocor to disclose "the priority date to which each asserted claim allegedly is entitled." Centocor's motion confuses the disclosure required by Patent Rule 3-1(e) with the substantive question of whether Centocor is in fact entitled to the benefit of whichever priority date it discloses—a question that will be resolved at trial by the jury.

II. Argument

Centocor argues that the Patent Rules are not meant to sort out the merits of the parties' substantive positions and that it is up to the jury to ultimately decide whether Centocor is entitled to the benefit of a particular priority date. Centocor's arguments misunderstand this Court's Patent Rules. By requiring early disclosure of the priority date that Plaintiffs will assert at trial, Patent Rule 3-1(e) in no way preempts the substantive determination whether Centocor is in fact entitled to the benefit of the disclosed filing date. Depending on how the claims are interpreted, Abbott will likely challenge Centocor's entitlement to claim priority to its original application by showing that the claimed invention is not supported by the disclosure of that application. Centocor will then be entitled to offer evidence to rebut Abbott's evidence, and the jury will ultimately decide whether Centocor is entitled to the benefit of the March 18, 1991 filing date of the original application. Patent Rule 3-1(e)'s requirement that Centocor identify the priority date on which it will rely—and commit to a single date—well in advance of trial in no way eviscerates the jury's role, as suggested by Centocor.

Centocor's arguments about the burden of proof reflect the same misunderstanding and are similarly unavailing. See Centocor's Opposition at 4-6. As Abbott stated in its Motion To Compel, Tech. Licensing Corp. v. VideoTek, 545 F.3d 1316, 1327-29 (Fed. Cir. 2008), provides for a shifting burden of production on the anticipation question at trial. Under VideoTek, the defendant begins by introducing evidence that the claims are anticipated by prior art that predates the date of the application that led to the patent-in-suit—not a priority date within the meaning of Patent Rule 3-1(e). The burden then shifts to the patentee to produce evidence of entitlement to an earlier priority date. All that Patent Rule 3-1(e) provides is that Centocor will be limited to asserting a single priority date—the one disclosed under Patent Rule 3-1(e)—at this point, rather than potentially repeating the step at trial using multiple priority dates. Patent Rule 3-1(e)'s requirement is therefore perfectly consistent with VideoTek.

Centocor's further argument regarding the purpose of the Patent Rules (providing notice to the Defendant) also misses the mark. See Centocor's Opposition at 6-7. The question here is the scope of that notice; whether it is sufficient to identify a number of possible priority dates, or whether, as required by the plain text of the rule, Centocor must commit to a single contention that can be changed only upon a showing of good cause. Centocor points out that Abbott articulated multiple theories of invalidity in its Invalidity Contentions based on multiple priority dates. Abbott was indeed forced to do so in order to deal with Centocor's failure to comply with Patent Rule 3-1(e). This should in no way excuse Centocor's failure to comply with the rule. Similarly, the interrogatories and requests for admissions discussed by Centocor were intended to remedy Centocor's failure to disclose a single date by narrowing the dates asserted to a single one. Because these efforts were unsuccessful, Abbott brought this Motion To Compel.<sup>1</sup>

The basic considerations at issue here remain unchanged. The plain language and clear purpose of Patent Rule 3-1(e) required Centocor to make choices about its contentions and identify a priority date that it will assert at trial. Because of Centocor's insistence that it can assert multiple priority dates, Abbott faces the imminent prospect of having to prepare an expert report that will be forced to deal in the alternative with the large number of priority dates theoretically available. Of equal concern, the parties, the Court and the jury will then face a trial where both parties' experts will be expressing multiple, contingent opinions about the prior art and the different specifications. Centocor's arguments are devoid of merit and the Court should reject them.

III. Conclusion

Abbott respectfully requests that the Court compel Plaintiffs respond to discovery requests and comply with P.R. 3-1 by confirming that Plaintiffs are bound by their contention that March 18, 1991 is the priority date for the asserted claims of the patents-in-suit on which they will rely at trial.
